THE HUNTING OF WHALES

Whales produce sounds to communicate with other whales. When they make these calls, they are indicating where they are and what they are doing. Water is an excellent means* for conducting sound. The sounds are so extremely loud that whales can communicate over hundreds or thousands of miles. Biologists and experts are worried about whales because boats and other human activities produce noise pollution in the ocean and that is not good for the communication system of whales.

Biologists think that whales have a sophisticated language but they do not really know what they say between them. Whales have large brains and can be quite intelligent. For example, whales can remember specific places along the coast and the ocean. They can travel far but they can return to the same places year after year.

In the past, whales were frequently hunted by people who used their parts to make various products. They are very attractive to everyone and they are in danger of extinction. The hunting of whales has unfortunately existed for thousands of years.

Many books and paintings are about whales. For example, in 1851, there was a book about a white whale called "Moby-Dick or The Whale". The writer was Herman Melville; he is a very popular North American writer.
