They've got "the look"

- A. Japanese teenagers are not only shocking their parents, they're also shocking each other. Because they are under incredible pressure to be very successful but modest, teenagers in Japan often look for ways to escape. The craze they are into at the moment is called Yamamba "witch" in Japanese and the idea is to look as unnatural as possible.
- B. Yamamba girls wear tiny miniskirts, high plataforms boots and massive quantities of makeup. Yamamba boys dress exactly the same (except for the miniskirts!). Their hair can be any colour: blonde, blue, even green, but not normal black. Some of them paint their faces totally white and others spend hours on sunbeds to get a very dark tan.
- C. The Yamamba go around in large groups. They laugh and shout without getting embarrased about their behaviour. They eat in fast food bars, shop in trendy stores and adore mobile phones. They speak to their friends in their own special slang and love sending text messages on their mobiles. One girl, Liu, admits that she and her friends even send messages in class, such as, "Look at these awesome clothes I'm wearing!"
- D. It cost a lot of money to be a Yamamba, but money isn't enough. The Yamamba also practise a ritual dance called the para para in expensive nightclubs. Each para para song has its own steps and hand movements.
- E. In Japan, schools have a strong code of conformity, especially for girls: most teenagers must wear uniforms and standing out is a bad thing. Some people believe that this craze is a serious social problem, but the Yamamba say that they are only having fun and being free spirited. Others think they are "complete airheads", but I disagree. I think the Yamamba are making a statement against the very formal way of life in Japan and that there is more than just air in their heads.
